41. Both employers and job agencies publish job openings on job boards. Some job boards offer you the opportunity to 20 your search to jobs published directly by employers, and to ignore those published by agencies. It's a good to choose when searching for a job.
 Jobs posted by employers are the best ones to think about because your "cost of hire" will be low. On the other hand, agencies are paid by the employer for delivering the "winning" Many companies would rather not an agency's fee if another potential employee contacts them directly and is, , less expensive for the company. in the very highly paid jobs (top management), the existence of the job vacancy may be confidential - the employer doesn't want competitors, the media or even the internal organization to know that the exists. These openings are usually handled by head-hunters who are paid to provide candidate, who is typically very difficult to find.
 The majority of executive-level jobs you see on commercial boards are published by job agencies that are paid if someone they identify is hired. If you make yourself to the employer by direct mail the employer doesn't pay any fee to a recruiter.
